THE GAZETTE. FRIDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 2, 1859.

NAPOLEON THE GREAT. The following particulars relative to the forms and habits observed by Napoleon I. in his campaigns, are not without interest at the present time, as it is so much the custom to institute comparisons between the first Emperor of the French and his suc-

Whenever Napoleon I. halted in the course of a campaign, whether he was lodged in a palace or a cottage, the first thing done was to prepare for him a bed-chamber and a writing room. The latter was always the best of the two, and he attached more importance to it than to any other apartments he might occupy. When he bivouacked with the troops on the field, a second tent adjoining the imperial tent was prepared as the cabinet for business, and it was always arranged with the most minute care.

In the middle of the cabinet, stood a large table, on which was spread out the best existing map of the theatre of the war .--Along with the map were placed pins, headed with wax of various colors, for the purpose of marking the positions occupied by the troops. The Emperor attached more importance to his map than to any of the necessaries of life, and it was indispensable to place the map and the pins upon the table before any thing else was attended to. At night, twenty or thirty wax candles were placed round the map, and on it was laid a compass.

During marches, reconnoissances, and engagements, the Grand Equerry carried the map, folded and fastened to his breast by a button, so that it might always be at hand and ready to be presented to the Emperor wheverer he uttered the words "La corte."-In the four corners of the cabinet there were placed, whenever it was possible, four small tables for the secretaries to write at.

Every history of the time records the marvellous facility with which Napoleon 1, could dictate different orders to three or four persons at once, and it was requisite to transcribe these orders with a rapidity no less wonderful than that with which they were uttered. The secretaries had formed, for the sake of expedition, a curious sort of hieroglyphic writing, for example—a dra-gon's tail indicated the French army, a whip stood for Davoust's corps, a thorn for England, a sponge for commercial cities, &c. Napolean possessed a peculiar talent for deciphering these characters. Of course the orders thus dictated were transcribed by the secretaries before being despatched to the individuals for whom they were destined.

Besides the secretaries, there was a keeper of the portfolio. He wore a livery and ranked with the valets dechambre. This man never quitted the door of the Emperor's cabinet, and when the army was moving from place to place, he rode in front of one of the fourgons containing the books and papers of the cabinet. Whenever couriers arrived, the Grand Equerry or the Grand Marshal opened the packets and laid the despatches before the Emperor. If he were in his carriage, the envelopes were speedily seen flying from the windows; and if the despatches were of no importance, their fragments were seen fluttering after the envelopes. When in his carriage he would frequently occupy himself in tearing useless papers into extremely small pieces; with him it was a necessity to be always engaged in doing something.

The Imperial carriages invariably contained newspapers, books, and sometimes even the newest novels, and the Emperor read rapidly everything that came in his way. The carriage was fitted up with a mattress, on which he would lie down and take a nap when greatly fatigued. Within the carriage there were always drawers with locks, in nished to any who may desire them. which papers were deposited. A list of the Sth mo 2—d3w JAMES S. HALLOWELI which papers were deposited. A list of the relays were fixed up conveniently, so that the Emperor could glance over it whenever he wished; and at night the inside of the carriage was lighted by a large lamp. It was very plain, painted green, and had firstrate springs. The seat facing the Emperor's was usually occupied by the Grand Marshal. Napoleon's dress was always plain and neat. In summer it consisted of the green chasseur uniform, with the plaque of the Legion of Honor. When the weather was cold or damp, he wore, over this uniform, either the traditional redingotte gris, or the cloak with the embroidered red collar, distinguished by the designation of the Manteau de Marengo. He had always in readiness seven or eight saddle horses of mediocre quality, but very quiet and steady. On horseback Napoleon generally proceeded at a slow pace or gentle trot; and not unfrequently when absorbed in meditation he would give his horse the rein; but his horses were accustomed to his habits, and they instinctively followed the two chasseurs who preceded the Emperor.

When walking, if not totally abstracted by thought, he would hum a tune, or he would intone a few words in Italian, in the manner of recitative; then he would suddenly break off and address himself to some of his suite. If what he was about to say was a matter of no importance, he would address the individual simply by his name, Berthier, Caulin-court, or Mortier; but if he had any affair court, or Mortier; but if he had any affair to the School, may find him at his School Room, of business to communicate, he would comin the 2nd story of Brook Lodge, between the mence in a formal tone, Prince de Neufchatel, Duc de Vicenze, Duc de Trevise, &c.

When Napoleon fixed his quarters in a town, Berthier was always lodged in the same house with him, and the grand equerry was never allowed to be absent. Before the Emperor's arrival, a courier was sent forward to make the necessary preparations, and a list of the imperial suite was made out indicating the places in which each person was application to the above address. quartered. A commissary was also sent forward to purchase the necessary supplies of provisions, which were paid for in ready money. As to the Marshals, they almost invariably raised their supplies by requisi-

Fourteen carriages were usually filled with the provisions and baggage of the Emperor's suit. Mules with panniers carried such supplies of provisions as could be purchased when opportunities occurred, in case of its being found necessary to halt in a village, or to bivouse in the open field. In the latter case, five tents were pitched in some spot selected by the Emperor himself. These tents were covered with blue and white striped canvas. Two, placed closely together, and communicating one with the other, served for the Emperor's sleeping room and cabinet de travail. The officers of the highest rank took their meals in the third tent, the fourth was appropriated to the officers of the secondary rank, and the fifth was occupied by the Grand Marshal. These tents were always pitched near the quarters of the Imperial Guard, and they were perfectly accessible to any one who had occasion to approach them, in spite of all that has been said and written to the contrary.

Nothing done at head quarters was prearranged, and orders were issued, as it were a l'improvisite; nevertheless every one was required to be in readiness for the immediate performance of the duty assigned to them. Unlooked for intervals of repose, unexpected orders for departure, alterations of time and changes of routes and places, were matters of continual occurrence. The business which supervened, the reports and estafettes which arrived, were the signals by which the Emper or divided his time. Often, just at the moment when a brief interval of rest was expected, the words le voiture or a cheral suddenly resounded through the camp, and in a Boxes, Square and Globe Lanterns, Brushes, Feamoment all was bustle and movement at headquarters. In the space of ten minutes every one was ready; the march was often very rapid, and neither rain, snow, nor obstacles of any kind, would cause the least change of the plans fixed upon.

When circumstances obliged the Emperor to halt all night in the open air, it was customary in cold weather, to kindle a large fire, which was fed by vast quantities of wood .-M. Cadel Gassicourt affirms that he has seen whole trees felled for this purpose .-Whilst the fire was burning, the Emperor would walk about, chatting with Berthier, or absorbed in meditation, meanwhile taking large quantities of snuff, kicking aside the stones he encountered in his way, or tossing branches of trees into the fire.

The most harassing service at head-quarters, was that of the orderly officers; but, nevertheless, these appointments were held to be of the highest distinction, and were eagerly sought for. They were filled by young men belonging to the highest families in France; but more distinguished by their talents and attainments than by birth. Two were always on duty near the person of the Emperor; but during an engagement he availed himself of the services of all indiscriminately. As soon as the imperial lips uttered the words Un officir d'ordonnance! the nearest one in attendance advanced, received the orders verbally, and in spite of every interposing obstaele, transmitted them personally to the marshals to whom they were addressed. Frequently orderly officers were sent as couriers, with messages to the commanders of a particular army corps; having delivered the message, they would occasionally remain until some decisive affair transpired, when they would return, bearing the intelligence to the Emperor. The orderly officers were, moreover, employed in making reconnoissances and in drawing plans; and for this they were for the most part selected from the artillery of the engineers.

Four of the imperial pages were, in attendance at head-quarters. Each had his day of duty in rotation. This duty consisted in leading the Emperor's horse, carrying the telescope, and preparing the relays. Mameluke, Roustan, always carried a bottle of wine or liquor, of which Napoleon partook very sparingly at those times when he was too hurried to take his breakfast.
